Field of the Invention This invention relates to apparatus for clamping and unclamping blades to a rotor of a turbine. 2. Description of the Prior Art A turbine has a rotor with buckets mounted thereon. The rotor is rotatable within a hollow, stator, and is surrounded by a shroud. The shroud is provided with openings which expose the rotor to air. The openings are formed of a very thin sheet material, and extend radially through the shroud, in the same direction as the rotor blades, to permit the passage of air along the rotor and through the openings. In a gas turbine, the rotor is rotated at high speeds by a hot gas. The blades extend radially outwardly from the rotor, and contact air along the periphery of the shroud. The blades are held against the shroud by the pressure of the air. A turbine is normally built having a number of different arrangements of rotors and shrouds with blades of different lengths mounted thereon. The blades are generally of different lengths for the reason that it is advantageous to have all of the blades of the same length, so that, if one blade of a certain length is damaged, the same number of blades of the same length as the damaged blade can be utilized rather than blades of different lengths. In the prior art, blades have been provided with a clamping ring mounted at the root end portion. This ring is designed to be clamped to the rotor, and a corresponding opening provided in the shroud. Typically, a blade has a root end portion which is narrow, having a diameter of 0.15 to 0.22 inch. The clamping ring is mounted within the shroud opening, and in the past has been clamped to the blade by means of a nut and washer which mount the clamping ring within the shroud opening. This arrangement required a
