Cholangiocarcinoma: current risk factors. Biliary tract cancer (BTC) is the second most common hepatobiliary malignancy. It represents a significant clinical challenge due to a high burden of disease, dismal survival rates and limited therapeutic options. The incidence of BTC is increasing worldwide, particularly in several Western regions. The risk factors for BTC are well established and include primary sclerosing cholangitis, hepatolithiasis, biliary cirrhosis and primary biliary cirrhosis. Additional risk factors such as cholelithiasis, hepatitis C virus and Asian ethnicity have been described; however, a putative role in the pathogenesis of BTC has yet to be defined. Certain clinical and pathological features such as the presence of lymphovascular invasion, and lymph node and distant metastases are prognostically significant, and may identify high-risk patient groups.

Furthermore, patients with intrahepatic cholangiocarcinoma, perihilar cholangiocarcinoma and gallbladder cancer have additional unique risk profiles. In this Review, we discuss the evidence for the potential roles of factors that contribute to the risk of developing BTC and discuss whether additional factors are present, which may act as prognostic indicators.
