A: I would use the answer in the following post for the regex: Regex to find any numeric sequence in a string
The reason why it works is because numeric sequences are not inside of strings but can occur anywhere within a string (see this). If you use a lookbehind instead of a lookahead it would be harder to detect if the actual number is surrounded by text but the expression from the post would still match the sequence because it is enclosed by a group. The rest of the regex contains the dot sequence that ensures that the character class [0-9] does not match the dot. For a lot of reasons, sports-induced asthma is pretty common. It's much harder for players to keep their breathing under control when they're hyperventilating to hide lung damage — not to mention when they get into a chest-bustin'-match with another man who's not as physically adept, as we've seen a number of times. And for a lot of athletes, asthma can sometimes bring about an at-least-adequate understanding of how to stay on top of their physical training during potentially asthmatic times. But there are some elite high-level athletes who, by their own rules, can't really sneeze. Jaelen Strong, a former college football player who was redshirted at Oregon State and then played for the Tampa Bay Buccaneers, used to have asthma as a kid. "I think it was eighth grade, actually, that it began to get bad," he told ESPN last year. That's when he started taking medicine and started being able to breathe again, and he managed to follow that up with a starting position in the first round of the draft last year. But throughout the summer, he still had asthma-like symptoms. That's a problem: "I did what the doctors told me to do. I took a lot of steroids, I took a lot of anti-inflammatories. I didn't stop playing, but it was kind of hard for me to do. I mean, if I can't breathe, I can't do the best that I can do." After that, he got in a car crash that he said was so bad that he thought he was gonna die. And while that was going on, his asthma took an even worse turn 0cc13bf012
