Proteomic profiling of plasma membrane-associated proteins secreted by HepG2 cells and their modulation by dietary fat. As secreted proteins represent valuable candidates for new drug discovery, we developed a proteomic approach to analyze the extracellular protein composition of culture medium from HepG2 cells grown in the presence of 0.1, 0.3, or 1.0% (w/w) either poly- (sn-1,3) glycerophosphocholine or saturated free fatty acids. Based on this analysis, the proteins most likely to be secreted by HepG2 cells included serum albumin, apolipoprotein A-1, adiponectin, and plasma glutamyltransferase. These proteins represented approximately 0.1% or more of the total cell protein content. In addition, we identified a novel class of acidic proteins containing at least one Asn-Xaa-Thr motif, which comprised a large proportion of the total protein secreted by HepG2 cells, with a relative abundance of 10.6 +/- 0.2, 5.2 +/- 0.3, and 6.7 +/- 0.4%, respectively. In experiments using a dose response, enrichment with poly- (sn-1,3) glycerophosphocholine (poly-GPC) from the media appeared to enhance extracellular protein secretion of HepG2 cells by approximately 60%, which was evident after 3 days in culture in three independent experiments. This suggests that increased poly-GPC availability can significantly enhance hepatocellular protein secretion. In order to identify proteins whose level of secretion was modulated in an AGEs-dependent manner, we compared the protein profile of the medium from cells grown with and without exogenous glucose and fructose (0.1% w/w for both). In total, this identified protein sets of 281, 518, and 311 proteins that were more abundant in cells grown with
