A 59-year-old man in Harris County, Texas, died Tuesday evening after police say he was caught on camera carrying a child and hiding it in his car. The Guardian reported that the man drove away from a car wash in south Houston before returning later in the night. Surveillance cameras allegedly captured images of the man carrying a child in the car back to the car wash after leaving. The man then allegedly drove to a nearby hospital where a nurse noticed the child's leg injury and reported it to police. The child was taken to the hospital, where he was later identified as a six-year-old. The man was taken into custody. Houston police said the man admitted to having the child in his car and that he did not report the car's owner. "Why would you take a child in your car and try to hide it from the police?" Houston Police Chief Art Acevedo said during a press conference. "He could have had some medical problems or he had a condition. We don't know."

Mark Potok, a senior fellow with the Southern Poverty Law Center, was emotional describing the death of the boy. "The fact that they don't know exactly what's going on, that the authorities are not charging him with murder in any way, and they haven't got a decent explanation for why he took the child," he told The Guardian. The death was determined to be a homicide, Acevedo said during the press conference. He said the car was stopped on a freeway at a red light, but was then drove away. When the car returned, the child was in the backseat, Acevedo said. "We looked into this child's background and this child was with an adult," Acevedo said during the press conference. "[And] we have no other indication that the child was harmed, injured or abused other than the fact that he was alone, he was in the backseat of 6d1f23a050
